Malach was the eldest son of Marach, the first chieftain of his people who were numerous compared to the other houses of the Edain. The House of Marach was the Third House of the Edain. When they crossed the Blue Mountains into Beleriand, Malach dwelt at first with his people at Estolad but later journeyed north and entered the service of the Ñoldorin Elven-prince Fingon, son of the High Elven-king Fingollin of the Ñoldor in Hithlum. While living among the Ñoldor, Malach was given the name Aradan, meaning 'noble man' in the High Elven tongue. After fourteen years, he returned to Estolad upon the death of his father Marach and became the second Chieftain of Marach's people. Malach Aradan soon led a great part of his people, the "Marachians", westward of Beleriand to the country of Dor-lómin in the north which was given to his people by the Ñoldorin Elven-lords of the House of Fingollin.
